

thing to the majority, many others (consisting both of those who have been through it, and those who have not) realise that it has in general two serious drawbacks.

It provides no opportunity of acquiring any practical knowledge and little encouragement to develop a real appreciation of any form of art. The lack of the former renders it difficult for a young man to make good in any but professional occupations, and the lack of the latter ~~leads~~<sup>leads</sup> him to crave for abundance of external amusements. In fact, many have felt that their education - as a living experience - began only when their orthodox education was finished.